MPR BUSINESS SPOTLIGHT

MPR Economic Development Corp. Launches a New Project “Young Entrepreneur Connection”

Goal: Creating a pathway to take a young entrepreneur’s idea from the classroom to:

- create real student businesses (sales, services, product making etc.)
- solve MPR community problems & needs (social, environmental, municipal, business opportunities)

November isn’t just time to prepare for the holidays, although celebrations tend to take center stage. It’s also a time to recognize entrepreneurship. National Entrepreneurship Month was established in 2012, two years after the first National Entrepreneurs’ Day. That day is celebrated on the third Tuesday in November, but we take this opportunity to acknowledge the spirit of entrepreneurship all month long.

Who are the newest entrepreneurs?

Millennials are the newest generation of small business owners who choose self-employment for the same reasons as their predecessors: they want to be their own bosses, want flexibility and want to do work they’re passionate about. About four percent of millennials report being self-employed at age 30, but they’re not the only young entrepreneurs out there. Generation Z, comprised of people born between the mid-1990s to the mid-2000s, are developing interests and learning that small business can be a viable route for them – even perhaps while they’re still students.

Small business needs more young entrepreneurs

Kids can start making business decisions even if they’re selling lemonade or raking leaves, although help from parents and mentors is important. These hard-working young people may someday be leaders in the business world! Young people with a knack for time management may seek to start a small business as a side hustle to test the entrepreneurial waters. Gradual business growth as a part-time gig can validate a business idea while providing additional income.
